Validity of dental prescriptions

A dentist is an appropriate practitioner for the purpose of prescribing prescription-only medicines. A prescription written by a dentist is valid under the Medicines Act 1968 even where the item prescribed is not in the Dental Practitioners' Formulary. Under the terms of service, a National Health Service prescription written by a dentist is valid only if the medicinal products ordered are in the Dental Practitioners' Formulary, but a private prescription can order any prescription-only (or pharmacy or general sale list) medicine. Dentists are required by their registration body to restrict their prescribing to areas in which they are competent, and this would therefore mean that a dentist should generally prescribe only medicines which have uses in dentistry.
